

No Criminal Charges Recommended in Clinton Email Probe

Tuesday, July 5, 2016

Ken Fisher, a member of Cozen O'Connor's Real Estate department and Public Strategies group, discusses the FBI's decision in Hillary Clinton's email probe with CBS2 New York. The FBI announced that it will not recommend criminal charges against Clinton for her use of a private email server while secretary of state. Now that the biggest legal threat to Clinton's presidential campaign has been removed, Ken explains that, "The easiest way for her to move forward on the email scandal is to keep repeating the fact that the head of the FBI, who has no reason to be her political ally, found that there was no crime committed." Ken adds that President Obama's appearance on the campaign trail will also help Clinton move past the controversy because, "Vouching for her judgement will set the stage for her to be able to convince the American people that these flaws don't really disqualify her as a candidate for president."
